With an official decision concerning siting of the Colleges, Dr. Miller began to plan for an integrated Health Center that included a number of colleges. To that end he initiated a two year study that was published as a 5 volume set. The study was wide ranging and comprehensive, looking at present and projecting future health needs.

Although William Shands, Ralph Turlington and Emory Cross won support in the legislature, the Health Center needed state wide as well as local support. Tempers ran high after the Lippard Report came out, especially after Dr. Cason swung his support to Gainesville.

In an effort to gain state-wide support, Jefferson Hamilton designed a model medical school that was taken throughout the state. Brochures also argued for the importance of a health center.
